Born and raised in Rockhampton, Sam studied medicine at James Cook University in far north Queensland. He completed his internship and residency in Rockhampton, prior to commencing specialist training with the Royal Australian and New Zealand College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists through the Mater Mothers' training program in Brisbane. During this time, Sam developed an interest in minimally invasive surgery, and sought three years of additional training in advanced laparoscopic and robotic gynaecological surgery. He completed his first year of advanced training at the Royal Adelaide & Queen Elizabeth Hospital in South Australia with a focus on Urogynaecology. Whilst in Adelaide, Sam completed a Masters of Minimally Invasive Surgery through the University of Adelaide, and conducted research on laparoscopic sacrohysteropexy in which his findings were later presented both nationally and internationally. He then went on to complete an Australasian Gynaecological Endoscopy and Surgery Society (AGES) fellowship with the Sydney Women's Endosurgery Centre (SWEC).

The additional years of fellowship training has provided Sam with a sound surgical foundation for which he is credentialled to safely perform the highest level (level 6) of complexity in gynaecological surgeries. This includes both laparoscopic and robotic procedures, as well as advanced hysteroscopic surgery.

Alongside both his private and public work, Sam remains actively involved in medical education and research. He is the clinical lead in Obstetrics and Gynaecology at Northern Beaches Hospital for the Macquarie University Medical program, and also holds a conjoint associate lectureship through the University of New South Wales. His area of interest for research includes pelvic floor prolapse, endometriosis, and non-mesh alternatives for urinary incontinence. He was awarded the Christopher Kohlenberg Memorial Medal for his research conducted whilst undertaking specialist training.

As an exclusive gynaecology specialist with no obstetric private practice, Sam is able to devote his time specifically to the care and management of gynaecological complaints without the interruption of unexpected obstetric emergencies. Sam's practice is about providing personalised care that is both patient-centred and evidence based in a relaxed and friendly environment. Sam's practice is the Sydney Advanced Gynaecology Endosurgery (SAGE) Centre. He consults out of Northern Beaches Hospital and Chatswood.
